Farrier & Draper encapsulates both the history of Powerscourt Townhouse and how South William Street has been the heart of Dublin's fashion industry for years. The name itself originates from the 'Farriers' – part blacksmith, part veterinarian, who worked for the aristocracy that used to live in the house, and the 'Drapers' – garment industry workers, who operated their business in Powerscourt over 140 years ago.

Powerscourt House is the former Dublin townhouse of Viscount Powerscourt and now the Powerscourt Townhouse Centre.

It was constructed in the eighteenth century for Richard Wingfield, 3rd Viscount Powerscourt, member of the Irish House of Lords. The townhouse enabled him and his family to stay there when they were visiting from their Powerscourt Estate in Enniskerry, County Wicklow.

The House was designed by Robert Mack and dates from between 1771 to 1774, and has been characterised as the “last-gasp Palladianism on a grand scale on a narrow street”.
